Why Hire Remote

To who it may concern:

About Me

I have been a professional writer for more than two decades. My main living comes from technical writing in software and telecommunications. I adore writing. The quiet, concentration, and solitude of it suit my character perfectly. There is something about finishing a project — whether it be a book or a Sphinx generated website, creative or technical — that just can't be replaced for me. I like that my work is tangible, like a trades person. I like that it can be seen. I like to say, I wrote that.

Why Remote?

Five years ago I built a farm house in the Talamanca Mountains of southern Costa Rica, a UNESCO heritage site. I live on the outskirts of the most biodiverse thousand square kilometers in the world. I see jaguar footprints in the soft mud after rainfalls while walking my dog. I grow most of my own food. I drink from a river stream with no filtration because the water is that clean. How many people truly create the life they want? Very few in my experience. It's from here that I work — calm, unmolested by the pressing bills of North American life, and because I want to work, not because I have to work. That's what this remote life has done for me, and that's what I would like to share with you, a sincerely motivated writer who wants to be a part of your project.

Why Me?

If a person can't make themselves happy, how are they going to make you happy as an employer? Think about it? How much nonsense do you read on a daily basis, regurgitated slogans that pass as sincerity in cover letters? How much of it do you believe? I want to work for you because I've created the space and freedom in my life to actually care about what you're doing, not because I have pressing car payments. It's ridiculous to have people march into an office every day. The means of communicating and working remotely are so effective, and the environmental reasons not to drive into an office are so compelling, you really have to ask: why do companies still do it? Why not give me a try? You won't be sorry.

Sincerely,

Bruce MacDonald
